

ROAD TO VICTORY

Financial command and control for transition readiness

Victory Capital has a strong commitment to serving the military community – including veterans and those in uniform preparing to transition to civilian life.

The transition from active duty military service to civilian life looks different for every veteran, but one thing is true for all – financial readiness can provide flexibility to navigate a path to a more preferred career and helps avoid financial hardships and setbacks along the way.

Our military financial readiness program includes the original video series, the Road to Victory, and web-based content to help service members make better informed financial decisions.

Our mission is to be there to help make the financial journey easier.

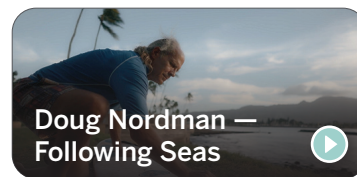

Watch these inspirational accounts of challenge, willpower and triumph. Then, take a look at our financial resources and tools. Don't forget to share them with your clients and loved ones (vcm.com/rtv-series).

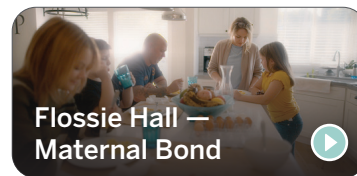

Alani Bankhead is an Air Force veteran who has always hated bullies. Today, she hunts down human traffickers and white-collar criminals.

When Coast Guard veteran Lamont Brown was told by a superior that his dream would never become a reality, he did what any would-be restaurateur would do. He ignored the dress down.

Retired Navy submariner, Doug Nordman, says retirement is just life 2.0. He spends his time surfing and teaching service members and military families the value of financial readiness.

Flossie Hall is a mother, active duty Navy spouse, and Chief Operating Officer of the Association of Military Spouse Entrepreneurs. All of this requires a talent for juggling and a strong maternal instinct.

David Tenebaum is an Air Force veteran and the founder of the nonprofit, Honor Media. His journey from the military through the private sector to a charity working with veterans is a lesson in service.

Raymond Lott is a decorated combat veteran for whom music is a form of therapy that helps calm the noise. Today, he is a successful music executive and the label he owns gives veteran musicians a platform to tell their stories to the people.

Andre Andrews is a Navy veteran serving a mission greater than himself. Inspired by World War II and Korean War veterans, he leveraged his military experience to give back to other vets and first responders.
